When operating a business involving vehicles, automotive crashes are a significant risk. With more drivers using mobile devices on the road, the potential for distracted driving increases, exposing your company to risk. Rollover crashes are particularly concerning for transportation companies, as nearly half of all large truck driver fatalities occur in them. Speed, attention, fatigue, and emotion are the key factors contributing to accidents. To prevent accidents and ensure the safety of your drivers, it's important to identify and manage these factors. But what happens if you are involved in an incident and have to give a deposition or go to court? With nuclear verdicts becoming more prolific, it's crucial to understand the potential consequences for your company if it's involved in a crash. This includes being called to give a deposition or testify in court, which can be guided by the plaintiff's attorney, through carefully crafted questions designed to lead to a particular response from the defendant. This can result in your company facing significant financial losses and liabilities. Therefore, it's essential for any business operating a fleet of passenger cars or fuel transports to prioritize this training session.
