Trade Talks with China Set to Resume, New Tariffs on Sept. 1

On Friday, August 23, Chinese trade officials announced they would implement new tariffs on milk, cream, cheese, and yogurt from the United States, beginning September 1. They plan new tariffs, ranging from five to ten percent, levied on a total of $75 billion worth of U.S. goods, in addition to tariffs already in place.

In response, President Donald Trump announced tariffs on $250 billion in goods and products imported into the United States from China will be increased to 30 percent beginning October 1, and that another $300 billion in Chinese goods will be subject to a 15 percent tariffs beginning on September 1 or December 15, depending on product type.

Meantime, trade negotiations are expected to resume in September in Washington. WCMA will continue to keep members posted on developments via this electronic newsletter and, as needed, member alerts.

U.S.-Japan Deal Reached "In Principle"

On Sunday, August 25 at the G7 Summit, President Trump announced that a trade agreement with Japan "is done in principle." Leaders from both countries note the deal will focus on agriculture and international tariffs, and hope that it could be signed in September. The agreement should not require congressional action and, as a result, could be implemented by January 2020.

Prior to this announcement, WCMA joined with the U.S. Dairy Export Council (USDEC) in a letter to U.S. Trade Representative Robert Lighthizer and Department of Agriculture Secretary Sonny Perdue encouraging swift negotiations with Japan to allow greater trade opportunity. In 2017, Japan imported $143 million in cheese from the United States, and a recent study commissioned by USDEC shows U.S. dairy exporters could triple their sales in the country over the next decade.
